The EPA MATS rule is creating reliability concerns for the electric industry. EPA has maintained that the timeline they have laid out is attainable, given the tools available to the States. Now that the EPA has released a firm timeline, utilities and their regulators are better equipped to make decisions about how to comply with the rules. But – how could this timing inform and impact regulatory action?

Come join us to understand more about decision-making in an uncertain future, and explore how best to make decisions about compliance options, while maintaining reliable electricity, and providing tools to achieve long-term results.
